

ABSTRACT

The present invention provides a birnavirus mutant which is suited as vaccine candidate in eradication control programmes. The mutant is not able to produce a native VP5 protein, and 5 this feature can be used as a marker to distinguish between animals vaccinated with the VP5 mutant or infected with a naturally-occurring birnavirus.